

A transition into carbon descent needs Independent Media Centres

If we're serious about making a transition to carbon descent, we need to think about change in lots of different aspects of life that we take for granted.

One of these is the way we find out about what's happening in our communities and in the world around us. At the moment, most of us rely on powerful corporations with a habit of distorting information in favour of the oil industry and promoting norms of consumption that favour high-energy industries.

The alternative we present is a network of citizen journalists reporting local events to a global audience, challenging powerful interests in the traditions of social and environmental justice movements.
